

Emerging Technology and Food Policy: Lessons from STS studies

Nagoya University, Masashi Tachikawa

Masashi Tachikawa is a Professor at the Graduate School of Environmental Sciences (sociology) at Nagoya University since 2017. He has spent more than twenty years at research institutes belonging to the Japanese Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries. Then he moved to the College of Agriculture, Ibaraki University before joining Nagoya University. He has Bachelor degree (sociology) from University of Tokyo in 1984; Masters' degree (sociology) from Michigan State University in 1993; PhD (agricultural economics) from University of Tokyo in 2002. His major interests are; sociology of agriculture and food, science/technology and society, risk governance. His research has dealing with emerging technologies, such as biotechnology, nanotechnology, genome editing, and so on. His recent publication includes; Coexistence of Genetically Modified Crops: Policy and Discourse in the EU (Norin Tokei Shuppan, 2017); Emerging Technology and Citizen: Questions from Food Nanotechnology (Nihon Keizai Hyoron-sha, 2013).